About Us

The National Fetal-Infant Mortality Review (NFIMR)

Established in 1990, NFIMR is a resource center providing information and advice about implementing the fetal and infant mortality review (FIMR) method. FIMR is both an on-going community needs assessment and a mechanism to improve health status of women and infants. The resource center provides information on topics such as confidentiality, liability, data collection, home interview techniques, coalition building, taking recommendations to action, coordinating with other local mortality reviews, and using local FIMR information for regional/state assessment and planning. Referrals to expert consultants are available. NFIMR is a collaborative effort between the federal Maternal and Child Health Bureau and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

FIMR is:

- a strategy to close the gap in health disparities at the community level
- a timely and valuable source of information about changing health care systems and how they affect real families trying to access them
- a community coalition that promotes volunteerism and good citizenship and will translate into local accountability
- a community coalition that can represent all ethnic and cultural views in the community
- a strategy that improves communication among health and human service providers
- a form of continuous quality improvement that allows communities to assess the performance of systems and the impact of changes in those systems
- a voice for local families who have lost their baby.
